II. In figurative and transferred applications.

Under the following heads are placed only those figurative uses which admit of being classified under some general concept, the factor determining will usually be found under the verbs most commonly occurring in the various phrases, together with many special uses which are confined to one or other of those verbs (see e.g. Bring v. 27, Cast v. 83, Come v. 69, Draw v. 89, etc.). Some uncertainty attaches to the origin and development of many of these uses, the variety of which is so great that the adverb comes to present a number of highly divergent and even directly opposite senses, e.g. cut up kind up (sense 29) in contrast with to break up (sense 21 b).

Up-, prefix, representing OE. up-, upp- (see below) and corresponding to OFris. op-, up- (WFris. op-, NFris. üp-, ap-), MDu. and Du. op-, OS., MLG., and LG. up-, OHG. and MHG. ûf- (G. auf-), ON., Icel., and Norw. upp-, MSw. up-, upp- (also op-, opp-), Sw. upp-, MDa. and Da. op-.

The prefix is identical with the adverb Up[1], from which in OE. it becomes clearly separable only when prefixed to nouns and adjs. In the cognate languages there is much variation in the extent to which it is employed with different parts of speech. In OS. and OFris. it occurs with verbs and nouns, in OHG. with verbs, nouns, and a few adjs., in ON. chiefly with verbs, in MHG., MLG., MDu., MSw., and MDa. with both verbs and nouns, and occasionally adjs. In the later and modern forms of these languages the use of the prefix has increased as in English, and parallel formations are very common; in Icelandic and Dutch it is the commonest compound is important enough to appear as a main word.

Of the numerous formations with up- which have been employed in English, only a limited number are of a permanent character. A large proportion consists of forms employed for the nonce, especially for metrical reasons, and the same compound may recur several times without any historical continuity; such isolated occurrences, indeed, are often separated by an interval of several centuries. A number of these are given in the following sections, as illustrations of the various uses of the prefix in the different periods of the language.

I. In comb. with sbs. (except as in 7, 8).

1. In OE. up- occurs freely with sbs. in the sense of 'occupying a higher position', 'upper', 'superior', as up-eard, -ende, -engel, -flôr, etc. Some of these, however, are only found in poetry. In ME. this type practically disappears, and in later use is chiefly represented by Upland sb.[2] and Upside, with an occasional rare formation, as upwold.

b. With the sense of 'in a supported state', up- occurs with nouns in OE. upheald ME. uphald, uphold, ME. uptie (naut.), and the modern upkeep.

2. In the sense of 'upwards' OE. had compounds of up- with nouns, mainly derived from intransitive verbs, as up-cyme, -fęreld, -ryne, -spring, -stige, rarely from transitive, as upweaxn. Of these only upspring and upsty survived in ME., but a number of new formations were added, as the obsolete uparist, -brixle, -hrud, -ras, -rist, and the surviving uphraid, -come, -rise, -set. Between 1450 and 1800 new formations are rare, the chief being upcast and upstir in the 16th cent., with upskip and upstart (as designations of persons) from the same period; also upshot (with variants -shoot and -shut), in which the force of the up- is not clear. After 1800 the type reappears and subsequently becomes common. A considerable number of the examples are of sufficient importance to be entered as main words in their alphabetical places, as upheat, -break, -burst, -flow, -growth, -heaval, -lift, etc. Others of more recent origin or less currency are upblaze, -curl, -curve, -drift, -glance, -gush, -haul, -heave, -jet, -jump, -liftment, -slip, -sweep. In upset, as in the corresponding verb, the prefix is employed in an unusual sense.

1577 Sec. Packet of Advices to Men of Shaftesbury 55 They are better at *Up-cry, and Out-cry, and Down-cry. 1876 Mayne Beauch. Career xxvi, I suggest an arrowhead in the *up-flight. 1860 Hawthorne Mark. Faun xvi, The shifting..*up-gush and downfall of water. 1850 Vivian Deb. Coal Clause (1851) p. xv, The 'Great Lower Veins' varying from 50 feet on the Northern to 200 feet on the Southern outcrop, and upwards of 70 feet on the Central *upheave. 1827 Sporting Magazine L. 128 He received some dreadful *up-hits in his throat. 1850 'H. Hieover' Pract. Horsemanship 129 The moment he does this, give him an *up-pull. 1839 Ure Dict. Arts 893 The line over 5, represents the down-shift, and d' the *up-shift [of a vein]. 1876 Whitby Gloss., Upshow*,..display.

3. More rarely, up- is employed in the sense of 'upwards', with other nouns than those of action, e.g. OE. upweg, early mod.E. upway, and the recent up-grade, -road, -shaft, -wave.

II. 3. Up- is rarely employed in combination with adjs.; upheaded (16th cent. and mod. dial.), upstraight (17th cent.), upfingered, upheartred, upnosed, and upsighted (19th cent.) are unusual types, as also are upspring and upstart (16th cent.) employed as adjs., but retaining the form of the noun or verb.

III. With verbs, participles, verbal substantives, and agent-nouns.

4. In OE. the placing of up immediately before a verbal form was determined by the syntactical principles which have been explained in the article on Out-. The number of verbs with which up was commonly employed in this way is not large; it includes âbrecan, âhebban, ârǽran, drîxan, etc., gân, hebban, wĉcan, springan, spryttan, stigan, ynnan. It is difficult to determine in how many of these the adverb had become a real prefix, but apparently it had attained this function in some forms, as up-âhebban and upheban. In ME. the use of the prefix is thoroughly established, though it is not always possible to distinguish between real compounds and simple precedence of the adverb on metrical or rhetorical grounds. A number of these uncertain examples may be found under various senses of Up adv.[1] Of those established compounds which require separate entry some occur as early as the 13th century, as uphraid, -break, -bring, -come, -go, -nim, -stand, etc., and many more are found from about 1300 onwards, as uplear, -call, -cast, -drawn, -give, -heave, -hold, -leap, etc. Others have been constantly added during the following centuries, so that even with the disappearance of earlier instances the type has been well maintained down to the present day. A considerable proportion, however, occur only in poetry, and are simple substitutions for the verb followed by the adverb, although they are regarded as real compounds and written as one word.

In the OE. collocations or compounds the prefix has regularly the sense of 'upwards'. In ME. it also assumes various transferred or figurative senses of the adverb, and latterly may have any meaning which has attached to this in connexion with a verb, e.g. uphind to bind up; up-pen to pen up; upspeed, to speed up, etc. The same variety of meaning naturally occurs also in combination with participles and verbal nouns.

In addition to those which are entered as main words, the following examples illustrate the tendency to employ the prefix in place of the adverb. The first group contains examples earlier than 1650, the second those of more recent origin (mostly after 1800); where no definition is added, the meaning is that of the simple verb in conjunction with up.

The earlier group could be considerably enlarged by the inclusion of examples from Scottish poets of the 16th cent., esp. Douglas, who freely employs such forms as upblese (= blaze), -flow, -glida, -hese (= raise), -kindle, -rax (= stretch), -rive, -sprent, -steud, -steur, -strike, -swak, -swarp, -swelt. Instances from other authors are upbrace, -heck, -lese (= gather), -sit, -skail, -spread, -sprinkle, -wen (= rise).

5. The use of up with past pples., originally syntactical, gave rise to compounds of which several had already so far established themselves in OE. that derivatives in -nes and -lîce were formed from them. Examples are up(d)hafen, updâfesed, up(d)sprungen, updâstigen, upcumen. In ME. a number of new formations appear; among the earlier of these are upborne, -drawn, -folden, -hung, -laid, -lifted, -reft, -risen, -set. In the 16th and 17th cent. there are also frequent examples, and the type is still usual, but at all periods these forms have been mainly employed in verse. When used attributively the stress is normally on the prefix, but metrical instances frequently retain it on the stem.

The following are illustrations of casual examples of earlier and later date; a few others are used by Scottish writers of the 16th cent., esp. Douglas.

(a) †upaheven [OE. up-âhafen], lifted up, uplifted; †upbounden, tied up; upbred, -framed; †upgraven, dug up; †uphoist, lifted up; yuled; †uplent, arrived on high; upploughed, -puffed, -pulled, -reft, -rent, -ripped, †upsete(d, oppressed; †upshet, shut up, enclosed; upshut, -soaked, †-soaken, -stalled; †upstreyht, upstretched; upsucked, -trailed, †-whelmed, -wrapped, -wrought.

6. The use of up before present participles, and forming possible combinations with these, is somewhat rare in OE.; the chief examples which occur are up(d)stigende, upstandende, and upyrnende. ME. furnishes a few instances, as uparising, -hanging, -looking, -springing, -tempering; but this type of formation becomes common only after 1500. In the following illustrations of casual forms the earlier examples are separated from those occurring after 1700.

(a) uparising, -belching, -blowing, -botching, -creeping, -floating, -hasping (=closing), -hoising, -leaning, -peaking (Feak *v.*2), -plucking, -riving, -seizing, †-souping (= swallowing), †-sparpling (= scattering), -steaming, -tempering.

b. In the earlier periods of the language these forms in -ing were not employed attributively. Examples of this use begin to appear in the 16th century, but are not common before the 19th. As adjectives, such compounds would normally have the main stress on the prefix, and a secondary stress on the stem (e.g. upbearing, upcree-ping), but in verse the full stressing of the stem is frequently retained. The following illustrations of rarer forms are divided into earlier and later instances.
